This is a game where people make up stories about wonderful, terrible, impossible, glorious things. All the characters and events portrayed in this magical talking shapeshifting cats is purely coincidental, but kinda hilarious.

Thanks go to my good friend and alpha reader Jon Peacock, to my playtesters Rodrigo, Peter, Laurie, and Blake, and to Fred, Rob, Sean, Lenny, and all the Evil Hat crew for giving me this opportunity. Thanks also to the members of the Google+ Fate Core Community who gave valuable feedback on early drafts of this project, including Jack Stephenson-Carr, who suggested the Warden's Cat Walk power, as well as Jon Smejkal and Hans Messersmith for their feedback on the Seeker's Prognostication power.

And last but not least, thanks to my wonderful partner Blake for his patience in putting up with me talking about this thing constantly for the last few months.

Using This Supplement

In The Secrets of Cats you'll play magical cats whose duty is to protect their poor, vulnerable humans—whom they call Burdens—from the many threats that lurk in the night.

Part I focuses on the duty of cats and the world they inhabit, while Part II gives you everything you need to create and play an empowered feline. Part III describes an old mining town called Silver Ford and Part IV outlines a story set there called Black Silver. When kids exploring the old silver mine one Halloween unleash a terrible evil upon the town, can your cats save the day? Finally, Part V suggests complications and threats for your cats to deal with in Silver Ford or your own corner of the world.

PART I: THE DUTY OF CATS: INTRODUCTION

“Settle down now,” Jezzabella says, peering down at you from her lofty perch. Chastened, you try to sit still and ignore the bug you’d been hunting. She nods slightly and then looks from kitten to kitten, each of them quieting as swiftly as you did under her searchlight gaze. Silence falls and she draws out the moment, her tail switching lazily back and forth as she inspects you. You crane your neck to see her and try not to fidget.

“I’m here to speak with you today about every cat’s sacred duty,” she says at last, her voice a soft, husky purr. “A duty to the Burdens in our lives.

“They seem big and powerful, don’t they? They make and control clever machines. They tame dogs and other dangerous animals. But the truth is that humans, without our help, are as helpless as suckling kittens.

“It is our duty to protect them from things they don’t understand, things they don’t believe exist; evil things that come for them in the night. Things that will hurt them if we fail.

“You will never be thanked, because your Burdens can never know what you do for them. But you and your magic will save them, time after time.”

Jezzabella pauses, looking down at each of you as you sit taller, practically glowing with purpose.

At last she narrows her eyes in satisfaction and nods. “If you’re sitting comfortably, then I’ll begin.”

The Hidden World

We occupy a different world from our Burdens, a world filled with sapient animals and all manner of spirits, creatures, and monsters. Not everything in this hidden world is hostile, but it’s difficult to tell a harmless pixie from a needle-toothed monster with a taste for human noses—and it’s better to be safe than sorry.

Most human myths contain a grain of truth. There really is a faerie realm that touches ours in the wild places, and horned hermits sometime emerge from the woods to snatch up careless campers. Ghosts of people and sapient animals exist, as do malevolent spirits that inspire stories about demons. Whatever you can imagine, it’s out there, somewhere.

But we must also look closer to home; the most insidious evil of all is a rogue cat willing to sacrifice sapient animals—including other cats—in their quest for ultimate power.

Sapient Animals

A sapient animal is one capable of true thought, not driven by mere instinct. The capacity for sapience varies by species: cats, crows, and ravens are almost always gifted, while dogs, squirrels, and mice rarely are. All sapient animals can speak with one another, and—though we often clash—many of us also have allies of other species. Such relationships are usually based on mutual self-interest rather than friendship, but there are exceptions. Ungifted animals greatly respect sapient members of their species and often obey them without hesitation.

The Duty of Cats

The world is not as simple as humans pretend. They like to believe in the illusions of cause and effect, action and reaction, but the reality they acknowledge is only a fraction of all that is. Some people, especially children, leave their minds open to the possibility of the supernatural and thus see the monsters hiding in the darkness.

We cats know better, too—a fortunate truth for our Burdens. While humans scurry about their workaday lives, we nap in the sunlight and wait for night to fall. Then we stand vigil while they sleep, ready to protect them with tooth and claw and a legacy of ancient magic.

Your duty is to protect your Burdens from the dark forces that would do them harm. Fortunately, you won't have to do it alone.

The Parliament of Cats

As brave and magical as you are, many threats we face are far more powerful. To vanquish such horrors we must work together, but we cats are territorial and difficult to organize. Thus we have our Parliament of Cats, a democratic council of the region's felines. Each Parliament meets at least monthly to discuss important matters and to deal with disciplinary issues and disputes among its members.

If you're going to play The Secrets of Cats as a campaign, rather than just the adventure we've provided, you'll need current and impending issues. Here's our suggestion:

Current Issue: Literally Herding Cats. Cats try hard to work together, but doing so is very much against their nature.

Impending Issue: Enemies in Concert. The cats' greatest advantage is that their foes don't work together. If their adversaries formed alliances, the cats would have quite a threat to fight against.

Of course, you don't have to use these.

What Cats Do

We dedicate ourselves to protecting our Burdens, but that's not all we do. There's plenty to occupy the rest of our time.

Territorial Matters: To a cat every place falls into one of three categories: my territory, something else's territory, or not my territory yet—and the lines between the last two are often blurry. Very rarely will we designate a neutral ground, where those living in the area agree not to take it as our own territory...for now.

Despite the importance of our sacred duty, most of us spend much of our time jealously guarding our territory, fighting rival cats and other sapient animals in border disputes. We do this because winning and keeping large swaths of territory earns serious respect from other animals and makes it easier to find what we need.

Forewarned Is Forearmed: We must anticipate dangers and prepare to deal with them if and when they materialize. It is important to regularly consult with Seekers who can foretell the future, and we must confer often with other members of the Parliament and local sapient animals to keep abreast of impending issues. We also organize regular patrols of trouble spots, like the Blue Moon Woods here in Silver Ford. Every cat is responsible for keeping our land safe; each of us takes a turn on patrol while our own territory is watched by allies.

Training and Education: Kittens have to learn the techniques and duties of cats at some point. Ideally your parents would have taught you, but most cats are taken soon after birth and sent to homes far away. It therefore falls to experienced cats to train our juniors in small, manageable groups.

Mundane Threats: Many threats don't pose any danger to our Burdens, but do to us. Nasty children with strings of firecrackers, vicious dogs, overzealous animal catchers: these are just a few examples. They must be handled if our community is to thrive. One of the most dangerous missions we undertake is the animal shelter run, a desperate effort to free our brothers and sisters from captivity and potential death. Burglars, murderers, and arsonists threaten our Burdens, of course, so we must protect them from these threats as well as the more esoteric ones.

For more on territory, see the Territory skill on page 12.

HOW BIG IS A REGION?

The region over which your Parliament presides can vary a lot. The entire town of Silver Ford is managed by just one Parliament, but in New York City each Parliament only handles a region a few blocks wide. Cats have no reliable means of communicating across great distances, especially in urban areas where busy roads and other obstacles make it impractical for messengers to travel widely.

Feline Politics: A Parliament of Cats is, as the name implies, a political organization. The leader of each Parliament can heavily influence the group's overall strategy, but it's still a democracy... more or less. Every cat has an opinion on how things ought to be done, and those cats most involved in the Parliament spend much time lobbying other members and maneuvering for power to make their opinions count more than others'.

Legal matters are also of great importance, as each Parliament arbitrates disputes between its members and disciplines cats who break the rules.

Each Parliament has its own bylaws, but common to all is the First Rule:

Don't let the humans find out what we can do.

Our ancestors were revered as gods in ancient Egypt, and the word "feline" is related to the Latin word for "lucky," but in medieval times we were viewed as symbols of evil or vanity and thousands of us were burned alive.

We're not taking any chances.

COMMON PARLIAMENTARY RULES

Your Parliament may have different rules, but these ones are common:

- Don't spy on each other from the astral plane
- Don't maim or kill another member of the Parliament except in self-defense
- Never sacrifice a sapient being to power your magic

Feline Magic

Human magicians use the principle of sympathy to cast spells on a subject through a picture or effigy. Similarly, feline magic uses the link between something's name and the thing itself. Knowing the True Name of your target will make your magic easier to perform and more powerful.

Discovering the True Names of our enemies is a critical part of our work. This is an easy task for most humans because their True Names are the same as their given names. They're careless and often speak their full names aloud or leave them lying around on pieces of paper for those of us with Seeking to find.

Sapient animals and supernatural creatures are much more cautious with their True Names—finding them out can be arduous indeed. Even spirits that were once human learn to adopt new names or titles. You might find their True Names written on tombstones or old papers. Otherwise, you may have to befriend the target, trick them, eavesdrop on them, or interrogate them or their allies.

Our most potent magics must be fueled by blood sacrifice. To lengthen and empower our spells, we will kill a small animal like a bird, mouse, frog, or rat and pour its life force into our spells. Of course, no decent feline would sacrifice a sapient animal.

There are four schools of magic. Each of us can only ever master one school and unlock its most powerful abilities, but experienced cats usually have some ability with all four.

- Warding is the school of protection and defense. A master of the art is accorded the title of Warden.
- Naming is the school of manipulation and control. A master of this school is known as a Namer.
- Shaping is the school of self-transformation, and a master is called a Shaper.
- Seeking is the school of seers and oracles. A master is known as a Seeker.

For more, see "Magic Skills" on page 13.

PART II: THE NAMING OF CATS: CHARACTER CREATION

Quick Reference

Creating a cat in The Secrets of Cats is very similar to creating a character in the Fate Core System:

- Refresh: 3—up to two points can be spent on additional magic or normal stunts.
- Aspects: High Concept, Trouble, Burdens, True Name, Free Aspect.
- Skills: One Great (+4), two Good (+3), three Fair (+2), four Average (+1). The skill options are Athletics, Burglary, Deceive, Empathy, Fight, Investigate, Lore, Notice, Physique, Provoke, Rapport, Stealth, Territory, and Will, as well as the magic skills: Warding, Naming, Shaping, and Seeking.
- Magic Stunts: Pick 3. Exclusive stunts require the high concept to contain the relevant title (Warden, Namer, Shaper, Seeker).
- Normal Stunts: Pick 3.
- Stress: 2 mental boxes, 2 physical boxes. Will and Physique increase stress as normal.
- Consequences: 1 mild, 1 moderate, and 1 severe. Superb Will and Physique provide extra mild consequences as normal.

On Being a Cat

A lot of the fun in The Secrets of Cats comes from cats being very different protagonists than human beings.

Nature: While the cats in this game are sapient and possessed of great magical powers, they're still cats. They are easily distracted by laser pointers or pieces of string, and their predatory instincts can make it difficult for them to keep prey alive for interrogation. They aren't generally fond of water and tend to poke their noses into places where they shouldn't. These tendencies are fertile ground for compels on a cat's high concept. Similarly, cats can invoke their high concepts to be good at things like balancing on a narrow rail or surviving a fall.

Senses: Cats have excellent night vision and can see in color, but struggle to distinguish between colors near the red end of the spectrum. They can't see if there's no light at all and can't hold flashlights, so in totally dark environments they must rely on magic or their other senses. Fortunately, their sense of smell is more than ten times better than humans', and they have a preternatural ability to sense air currents, objects, and spaces around them with their whiskers. Cats hear low-pitched sounds about as well as humans, but they can detect sounds at much higher pitches—higher than even dogs can sense.

Literacy: Cats have no written language and generally can't read human languages. They can however leave simple messages for each other such as "Stay away!" or "Danger here!" with scent markings, and can understand similar messages left by other animals.

Naiveté: Cats, clever as they are, know a lot about the human world. However, being outsiders, they are often baffled by the things that humans do or use. Most cats can't read pictographic signs, so they can't benefit from human books and histories. Rather than using their own experience, cats often have to piece together clues to understand human behaviors and tools. GMs, you can describe clues and events from this outsider's perspective and require Lore or Investigate rolls for cats to know even relatively basic things about the way humans do things. As a part of the cat's high concept, this is also rich fodder for compels.

Richard describes how the group finds a shoeprint outside the old mine that's relatively small and has an animal footprint on top of it. It's obvious to Peter that the impression was made by a kid's sneaker with a decal on the sole, but his cat Swift thinks it must be a small human being followed by an unknown animal.

Aspects

Cats have the following aspects:

High Concept

As for humans, this aspect describes who you are and what you do. Specializing in one of the schools of magic means that you must add the relevant title—Warden, Namer, Shaper, or Seeker (page 13).

Tack's high concept is Greedy Seeker.

Trouble

Your trouble causes drama in your life. You might be curious to a fault, bad-tempered, or a sucker for flattery. Perhaps your Burdens won't let you leave the house, you're haunted by an old enemy, or you live with a mean dog. Or maybe there's a fear or habit that you struggle to overcome.

Jezzabella's trouble is Youth Is Wasted on the Young, representing her impatience with the young cats she works with. This often leads her to do things herself that she really ought to delegate to younger felines.

Burdens

This aspect details the Burdens in your life. In less cat-centric terms, Burdens are the people your cat is dedicated to protecting, whether an entire neighborhood or a single homeless person. If you're a stray, pick a person or people whom you sometimes visit and think are worthy of protection. Describe them in an interesting way that suggests invokes or compels—cats call people Burdens for a reason! While you might accumulate more Burdens throughout your life, you begin with a Burden of one person or group of people.

Jezzabella's Burden is Witchy Widow Haggerty, a frail old lady who the local children think is a witch. Tack's Burden is Everyone on My Street because he lives from house to house and considers all of the street's residents to be under his protection.

True Name

You learned your True Name in a dream soon after you became an adult. You earned your True Name from your actions—it might be Brave Warrior or Silent Hunter—and it's part of your core identity. To share your True Name is a sign of great trust and respect, because someone who knows it has enormous power over you.

Your True Name might relate to an adventure shared with another PC during early adulthood. If you're struggling to come up with a True Name, discuss your character's history and coming of age with the other players.

Rod is struggling to come up with a True Name for his Warden, Black Paw, so he discusses his character's early life with the group. He describes that Black Paw was forced to sacrifice his brother's life in order to save his Burden. Black Paw upheld his duty over his own sibling's life, so Rod chooses a True Name of Oath-Keeper.

A CAT HAS THREE NAMES

Your True Name is your third and final name, but you have two others. First is your everyday name, chosen by the humans in your life. You're unlikely to answer to this name, and you'll probably be gravely offended if it's used by anyone who should know better.

Your kitten name was a physical characteristic or personality trait, like "Clumsy" or "Brown Ear." On the day you became an adult, you shed that name and replaced it with your own chosen name, though you may have decided to keep your kitten name or a variation of it.

Free Aspect

This aspect can be anything you'd like. For example, you could establish a relationship with another PC and invent some shared backstory, but you don't have to if nothing comes to mind. Write this aspect in the "Other Aspects" category of your character sheet.

Swift once protected Black Paw's Burden, Lily, while Black Paw was busy elsewhere. Because of this mutually beneficial relationship, Swift chooses I'll Scratch Your Back If You Scratch Mine as her free aspect.

Skills

Your cat gets one Great (+4) skill, two Good (+3) skills, three Fair (+2) skills, and four Average (+1) skills.

Regular Skills: These skills work the same as in Fate Core: Athletics, Burglary, Deceive, Empathy, Fight, Investigate, Lore, Notice, Physique, Provoke, Rapport, Stealth, and Will.

Contacts and Resources: These skills are replaced by Territory, which reflects how much space you control. Maintaining a large territory will make other cats and animals respect you and means you have more resources at your disposal. It also makes you a target for those who want to expand their own turf.

Want to find an albino squirrel for a rare ritual needed to fend off a hungry wendigo? Roll Territory to know where you can find one on your land. Want to find out what's being whispered behind your back? Roll Territory to find a cat impressed enough with you to spill it. Involved in a pissing contest with another cat for the deputy leadership of your Parliament of Cats? Roll Territory to create an advantage related to how big, powerful, and well known you are.

Defeating an animal with Territory in a conflict lets you steal some of his turf. When this happens, the winner and loser each writes down a situation aspect that persists until the loser persuades the winner to give his turf back or beats the winner in a conflict. You can't be saddled with more negative Territory aspects than the rating of your Territory skill.

Tack defeats a malevolent rabbit called The Lop in a fight and opts to steal part of his territory. Tack writes down Stole the Area in Back of The Lop's Hutch and The Lop writes down Tack Stole the Area in Back of My Hutch. These aspects stay in play until The Lop wins his turf back.

THE FULL SKILL LIST

Athletics	Investigate	Provoke	Territory
Burglary	Lore	Rapport	Warding*
Deceive	Naming*	Seeking*	Will
Empathy	Notice	Shaping*
Fight	Physique	Stealth

Magic Skills

The four magic skills are Warding, Naming, Seeking, and Shaping.

If you try to use a magical skill rated at Mediocre (+0) or below, you must pay a serious cost (Fate Core System, page 189) regardless of whether you succeed, tie, or fail. You also can't buy any of its stunts.

If you have a magical skill rated at Average (+1) or above, you can use it to accomplish the actions listed for that school and may buy any of its stunts not listed as exclusive.

To buy a school's exclusive stunts, you must master that school. When you master a magical school, add Warden, Namer, Seeker, or Shaper to your high concept as appropriate. You can only ever master one school, and your choice is final. No other magical skill may be higher than the skill you have mastered.

If you don't master a school at character creation, then the most powerful magic won't be available to you, but you'll keep your options open for later. You can master a school at any milestone, adding its title to your high concept.

You have three points to spend on magical stunts, but you can buy more by spending points of refresh as normal.

The lists of magical stunts in this chapter are not exhaustive. When designing new stunts, make them appropriate to the relevant school of magic and be sure to highlight the importance of sacrifice and True Names. Any magical effect that involves another target is easier, cheaper, or more powerful if you know the target's True Name.

GMs, if a stunt requires a sacrifice, talk with the players about whether hunting for the prey needs to be played out. Usually it's only warranted if the characters are limited by time or are handicapped. Hunting for prey is a challenge involving Stealth and Fight with a base time of one sleep.

CAT TIMEKEEPING

The smallest time interval recognized by cats is the nap—about 15 minutes, the length of an average cat nap. A sleep is about an hour long. Longer periods are measured in half days, days, weeks, months, and years.

Warding

Practitioners of this school of magic are a bulwark against the forces of evil.

Overcome: You can use Warding to overcome a ward set up against you specifically or cats in general.

Create an Advantage: By sacrificing a small animal and leaving its corpse as an offering to Death, you raise a powerful magical barrier around a place. Left untampered, this ward lasts until the sacrificial offering is nothing but bones, but humans tend to remove them long before that stage. To prevent interference, you may need to find ingenious hiding places for your offerings. The corpse must be fresh when you create the ward—one sleep old or less—but it doesn't have to be complete; you might like to bite the head and front parts off for a tasty snack before you get to work.

You can ward any place with a defined boundary like a wall, fence, or hedge. The opposition to creating the ward starts at Average (+1) for an area of up to two rooms, Fair (+2) for a house or area of similar size, or Great (+4) for anything up to half a mile in diameter. For each general or specific threat you want to block with the ward, increase the opposition by one. If you know a foe's True Name, then adding her to the ward won't increase the opposition. A ward cannot be altered once created; if you wish to defend against new threats, you must raise a new ward.

Succeeding with style when creating a ward gives you an extra free invoke. For every two additional shifts, you get another free invoke.

When a magical threat tries to enter a warded area, he will encounter what seems to be a solid, transparent dome that blocks his progress. A mundane threat will instead find that "luck" conspires against her to deny entry—lockpicks break, doors jam, windows refuse to shatter, and so on. If the ward's boundary is intangible—like the edge of a clearing—then stones trip her, roots entangle her, branches jab her in the eye, or she simply gets confused and turned around. You immediately sense any attempt to breach your ward, and you can roll Warding to actively oppose the intrusion, regardless of where you are. If your ward is breached, it remains intact and will block the target again if the foe leaves the warded area and tries to return. You may choose to override the ward and allow a threat to enter.

You can raise as many wards as you like, but an area can only be protected by one ward at a time. This is sometimes abused by cat troublemakers who deliberately over-extend their wards through an entire neighborhood, making it impossible for fellow felines to create their own wards.

Jezzabella wants to create a ward around Witchy Widow Haggerty's home that will keep out rats and one human she knows by sight. The base opposition to the Warding roll is Fair (+2); adding "rats" (+1) and "that creepy human guy" (+1) as designated threats increases the opposition to Great (+4). If she knew the human's True Name, then adding him as a designated threat wouldn't increase the opposition, meaning the final opposition would be Good (+3). Starting with Average (+1) Warding, she rolls and gets ++++, for a total of Superb (+5). She succeeds and gets one free invoke on the ward.

Wardens can lead a chorus of cats to improve an existing ward. Each cat in the chorus must have Warding at Average (+1) or better, but need not be a Warden. Every cat in the chorus must sing for at least one sleep. If interrupted, you must begin again from the start. When you finish the song, the ward gains an extra free invoke per cat in the chorus. Regardless of the ward's designated threats, any cat in the chorus can enter or exit the warded area and can extend this permission to anyone they choose.

Attack: Warding isn't used to attack.

Defend: You can use Warding to defend someone inside your ward against attacks from a designated threat, even if you aren't there. If you fail, then you become the target of the attack, taking your choice of mental or physical stress.

Warding Stunts

These stunts do not require a sacrifice.

Invisibility: You whisper your True Name backward to create an inverted ward around you, making you Invisible until the end of the scene. Roll Warding against passive opposition from the environment: it might be Superb (+5) if you're a dark grey cat trying to hide in a bright white corridor, but Average (+1) if you're in a dark alleyway. If you're a Warden, you can make multiple targets invisible by hiding everyone in a zone (+2 opposition) or by splitting your shifts among the targets chosen. Success with style grants an extra free invoke as normal.

Shadow Armor (Exclusive): You gather the surrounding shadows to armor your body, turning your fur black and your eyes into empty holes touched with faint glimmers of starlight. Gain Armor equal to your Warding for the rest of the scene and fill your lowest mental consequence. You can only use this power after nightfall or in dark places. This power can reduce the physical stress transferred to you from an active ward or by Absorb, but doesn't protect against attacks based on fire or light. While in this unnatural form, you can use Fight to attack spirits and vice versa.

Absorb (Exclusive): You whisper your and an ally's True Names to a pebble, linking you until the next sunrise or sunset. While you touch the pebble, any stress your ally would take is halved (rounded down), and the remainder you take as your choice of mental or physical stress. You can drop the pebble at any time, except when dice are being rolled against your ally. Anyone else who touches the pebble while this stunt is active shares a Strong Link with you and your ally (see Seeking on page 22). You can only protect one ally with this stunt at a time.

Cat Walk (Exclusive): By whispering your True Name to the air, you create wards set against yourself that are shaped in cunning ways. You can manifest temporary bridges, gantries, or ramps of pure force that let you climb to otherwise inaccessible places. You can use this power to overcome relevant obstacles or to create advantages related to being in a weird or unexpected position. The First Rule of the Parliament of Cats means this power mustn't be used in sight of humans; it has led to some embarrassing incidents for cats seen atop trees with no way down.

Naming

This school of magic lets you exert terrifying and direct control over a foe by using his True Name. Masters of this art are respected and feared in equal measure because a proficient Namer can do almost anything to a victim whose True Name she knows. Giving your True Name to a master of Naming is either incredibly foolhardy, a sign of great trust, or both.

Overcome: You can use your power over your own True Name to remove aspects related to mental domination or caused by hostile applications of Naming.

Create an Advantage: You can sacrifice a small animal and whisper a target's name to bless or curse it, wherever it is. Targets can defend themselves with Will or Naming. The aspect created must be specific and lasts until the next sunrise or sunset. If you don't know the target's True Name, your magic is weaker—the target gets +2 to defend, and success with style confers no additional benefit. You can only apply one blessing or curse to a given target at a time. Examples: Blessed with Luck in the Fight Against Black Heart, Cursed with Severe Nausea.

Attack: Naming isn't used to attack without a relevant stunt.

Defend: You can use your mastery of your own True Name to defend against Naming used on you.

Naming Stunts

Harm: You're proficient enough with Naming to directly harm an enemy within one zone of you. Speaking your foe's True Name to a small animal in your paws, you wound the animal to inflict identical but larger injuries on your target. This is a Naming attack, defended with Will or Naming. Scale does not apply to this stunt (page 20). The small animal won't die unless you inflict a consequence on your target, and you may limit attacks made with this power to one shift of stress. You can be disarmed if a compel or an advantage created makes you accidentally kill the animal or let it escape.

DIRECT CONTROL

Animate and Control both let you assume direct control over a target—an object or being, respectively. Once you assume control of a target, you can control it from any distance, but you must take an action to enter or leave direct control. While directly controlling a target, you experience the world from its perspective and can use their body as if it were your own, using its skills for physical actions and your own for mental actions. This level of control requires complete concentration and prevents you from using your own body—including defending yourself or perceiving your surroundings. You will sense any physical interference, though, and can return to your body on your turn in the next exchange.

Animate (Exclusive): By sacrificing a small animal and whispering your True Name to an inanimate object—including corpses—you imbue it with life until the next sunrise or sunset. The opposition depends on the size of the object, starting at Average (+1) for insect-sized objects and increasing by two per rung on the scale ladder (page 20). Animated objects can only move as their construction allows: a rope can slither, an action figure can walk around, but an inflexible statue can only judder on its base. Things you animate will follow simple instructions, but won't fight. You can also assume direct control of the object, letting you perform any actions you wish. An animated object has one Good (+3) skill and one Poor (–1) skill. Animated objects can see and hear, even if they don't have eyes or ears. The animating magic is quite fragile; it can be destroyed by attacking the animating energy directly from the astral plane or by attacking the physical object. Animated objects have one stress box. If you succeeded with style while animating the object, it gains a mild consequence. You can only animate one object at a time, unless you have the Multitasking stunt.

Control (Exclusive): This terrifying power lets you enter a mental conflict with an opponent up to one zone away whose True Name you know. In this conflict, you roll Naming opposed by your opponent's Will. Consequences inflicted during this conflict can be compelled to represent brief moments of control. If you take out your victim, you gain complete control over him until the next sunrise or sunset. When you aren't in direct control, the victim behaves like a shambling zombie that follows simple instructions but won't fight or act independently. You can only control one victim at a time, unless you have the Multitasking stunt.

Multitasking (Exclusive): This stunt lets you control up to two beings and two animated objects at the same time.

Shaping

Those who learn Shaping know that the body can be changed from within. By whispering your True Name to yourself, you can shape your body to make it better suited to the task at hand for the rest of the scene. Dabblers in the art can make minor alterations, but Shapers can effect more dramatic changes.

 Overcome: You can use Shaping to overcome an obstacle for which a minor change in your form would be useful. For example, you could try to escape from being Tied Up by shaping yourself to be more flexible.

 Create an Advantage: Roll Shaping to change your physical form for the rest of the scene. The opposition is Average (+1) for minor changes (like Razor Claws or A Coat as Black as Night) and higher for more extreme changes (like Musclebound or Unnaturally Huge Grin). You can't change your size by more than about a quarter—meaning you can't change your place on the scale ladder—or have more than one Shaping advantage active at a time.

 Attack: Shaping isn't used to attack.

 Defend: As a practitioner of Shaping, you know yourself inside out. You can use Shaping to defend against attempts to magically change your body. This includes the Harm power of the Naming school.

Scale Rules

The scale ladder has the following rungs:

Insect < Mouse < Rat < Cat < Dog < Human < Tiger < Horse

When attacking or defending creatures of different scale, apply the following bonuses:

Size	Attacker	Defender
Larger	Weapon:+2	Armor:+2
Smaller	Attack +1	Defend +1

If you're a cat attacking a mouse, then you're two rungs higher on the scale ladder. The mouse gets +2 to his defense roll, but you get +4 to your Weapon rating if you hit him. If the mouse counterattacks, he gets +2 to his attack roll, but you get +4 to your Armor rating if he hits you.

Shaping Stunts

A Knack for Change: You're more experienced at changing your physical form. Each time you purchase this stunt, you can maintain another simultaneous Shaping aspect.

Change Size (Exclusive): You can use Shaping to radically change your size for the rest of the scene, letting you move along the scale ladder. The opposition increases by two per rung along the scale ladder you want to transform.

Swift wants to grow to the size of a tiger. That's three rungs up the scale ladder, so the opposition is Fantastic (+6).

Disguise (Exclusive): This stunt lets you change your physical appearance to exactly match that of any other cat, including coat pattern, scars, and deformities. To adopt a disguise, create an advantage using Shaping with passive opposition based on how well you know the other cat:

Familiarity	Opposition
You're working from a description	Legendary (+8)
You saw them once at a distance	Epic (+7)
You met them once	Fantastic (+6)
You've met them a few times	Superb (+5)
You see them around all the time	Great (+4)
You meet with them regularly	Good (+3)
You're good friends	Fair (+2)

If you know the target's True Name, then you automatically succeed with style. If you succeed at a cost, the details of the disguise are somehow imperfect—modify the disguise aspect to reflect this—but the disguise is otherwise perfect. To fool anyone who knows the target, you'll still need to roll Deceive.

You can also use this power to create a disguise based on an imaginary cat. In this case, the opposition is based on how much the disguise looks different from you, starting at Average (+1) and increasing by one per difference in appearance.

Shadow Form (Exclusive): Whispering your name to the darkness, you transform yourself into a shadow, gaining Shadow Form for the rest of the scene. To attempt to transform, use Shaping with Fair (+2) opposition. If you fail the roll, you still become a shadow, but the transformation warps your mind; you gain a negative aspect—like Cruel Streak—for the rest of the scene. In this form you can see in total darkness, you're completely invulnerable to physical sources of harm, and you can attack spirits (with Fight). Because you exist in two dimensions, you can slip through the narrowest crack and travel almost anywhere. However, you can't travel outside of shadows or darkness, can't attack or interact with anything physical, and can be hurt by spirits and light. Though you're a shadow in a shadow, you aren't invisible; you're darker than your surroundings, and your eyes still shine with reflected light. You may, however, invoke Shadow Form to aid your Stealth rolls.

Seeking

Cats are curious and are always finding trouble. The truth is, if you're skilled in Seeking, you can find almost anything—so long as you know what you're looking for. Experienced users of this art can find their way into a sleeper's dreams, and Seekers can even leave their physical vessels to journey on the astral plane or dream of future portents.

 Overcome: Using Seeking, you can become aware of the direction and distance of any specific place, object, or being for the rest of the scene.

When you use Seeking to look for a place or object, the passive opposition depends on how well hidden the target is. If you only have a picture or description of the object, you have a Poor Link, which can be invoked against you. If you've seen the target, no aspect applies. If you have a piece of it, you have a Strong Link, which you can invoke.

When you use Seeking to find a being, they actively oppose you with Will or Seeking. If your target succeeds with style while defending, she realizes someone is seeking her and will know your direction and distance for the rest of the scene. If you're working from a description or picture, you have a Poor Link. If you've seen your target before or know her name, then no aspect applies. If you have a piece of your target, such as a hair, you have a Strong Link. If you know your target's True Name, you automatically succeed without a roll.

You can also use Seeking to remove aspects related to being lost or navigating through a maze-like environment.

If you succeed with style, you also gain a feel for the target itself. This reveals one of the target's aspects to you and gives you a free invoke on it. You can only ever gain this benefit once per target.

 Create an Advantage: Seeking lets you find optimal routes when you're chasing prey, trying to escape, or otherwise moving through an environment. You can create aspects like Shortcut or "I know exactly where I am." You can also create advantages related to finding things you need, as long as it's plausible. For example, in the woods you might create an advantage called Abandoned Camping Stove.

 Attack: Seeking isn't used to attack.

 Defend: You can use Seeking to defend against magical attempts to locate you or things you've deliberately hidden as well as attempts to inflict aspects on you like Lost in the Wilderness.

The Time Ladder

For a full description of time increments, see Fate Core System (page 197). The relevant time increments for Psychometry (page 25) are as follows:

A month → a few months → half a year → a year → a few years → half a decade → a decade

Seeking Stunts

Dreamwalking: You attune yourself to a sleeping being by inhaling some of his breath, letting you visit his dream when you fall asleep yourself. In the dream you can speak with the dreamer, even if he's human, and you can use your magic to shape his dreams. You can use this power to transform a nightmare into a pleasant dream, but you can also nefariously implant a belief or instruction into the dreamer's subconscious. Some cats use this power just to speak and bond with their human companions and to enjoy the wondrous dreamscapes of their imagination.

Fighting a nightmare to calm the sleeper is mentally taxing. Resolve it as a mental conflict of Seeking, opposed by the nightmare's intensity. A mild anxiety dream has Average (+1) intensity and no stress boxes, while a guilt-stricken nightmare of terror and loss has Superb (+5) intensity, three stress boxes, and three consequences. Losing this conflict can leave you feeling very drained when you wake; you may even suffer from a new phobia or other psychological problem. If you defeat the nightmare, you can apply a positive aspect to the dreamer or completely cure a mental consequence related to the root of the bad dream.

You can converse with the dreamer with complete fluency. You can also use your access to the dreamer's subconscious mind to begin a mental conflict. If you take him out in this conflict, you can dictate a belief that afflicts him until he's convinced otherwise or you can implant a single instruction he must carry out during the next day. This is not something that should be trifled with, however—many a cat has been rendered permanently catatonic after a dream conflict gone wrong.

Because dreams are so malleable, everyone experiencing it can declare story details without spending fate points. You can shape the dream to create advantages by using Seeking, opposed by the dreamer's Will. For example, you might create the aspect Nightmarish Chase to soften up the target for a Provoke attack. Be wary of lucid dreamers, however, who can turn the tables by creating their own advantages.

If you know True Name of a participant in the dream, create a situation aspect related to the participant's name. You can invoke this aspect on any roll made against her, even if she isn't the dreamer.

Multiple Dreamwalkers can visit the same dream, which may explain that time you woke under a pile of cats after a night of vivid dreams. Dreamwalkers can bring other cats with them, but strictly as invisible observers who can't interact with the dreamer or the dream. GMs, if any players aren't involved in the dream scene as Dreamwalkers or observers, ask if they want to play figments of the dreamer's imagination.

Prognostication (Exclusive): You can delve into your own dreams and return with knowledge of what is yet to be. Once per session, after you've slept, make a Seeking roll against Average (+1) opposition.

If you fail, you get a single-word aspect hinting at a future event.

If you succeed, you get a single-word aspect hinting at a future event and a timeframe of several days in which it will happen. You can spend shifts, one at a time, to reduce the timeframe by one increment (Fate Core System, page 197) or to add a word to the prophetic aspect, not counting linking words.

If you still have at least three shifts once you stop refining the prophecy, you succeed with style as normal.

To determine the nature of the prophecy, roll a separate/distinctly colored die:

Result	The prophecy hints at...
☹	Something horrible (Betrayed, Killed).
☺	Something beneficial (Answers, Ally).
⚫	A complication (Promise, Doubts).

GMs, if you wish to give players more control over the process, let them choose the prophecy type before rolling.

You can't seek a second prophecy until the first has come to pass or been averted.

Nameless naps and decides to get a glimpse of the future. Laurie rolls Seeking, rated Great (+4), and gets ☹☺☺☺ for a total of Fantastic (+6), giving him five shifts. To determine the nature of the prophecy, he rolls and gets ☹, so it'll be about something horrible. Nameless gets the prophecy "Die six to ten days from now." Laurie spends a shift to narrow the timeframe, so Richard amends the prophecy to "Die seven days from now." Laurie spends another shift to add a word to the prophecy, hoping to find out who will die. Richard gives him "Tack will die seven days from now." Laurie decides to stop there. With three shifts remaining, he succeeds with style, gaining a second free invoke on the prophetic aspect.

Astral Projection (Exclusive): While your body sleeps, you can send your soul traveling and take an Astral Form. In this form, no ordinary door or wall can stop you, you can see in complete darkness, and you can fly at great speeds. However, you can't pass through natural rock, earth, or living things. The astral realm is home to many anchor-less spirits that will take exception to you entering their domain, but just as many are useful sources of information. If you're within a few yards of a cat or another psychically aware being, it can see your ghostly presence with Notice, opposed by your Stealth. You can invoke Astral Form to help you on this roll. Your spiritual form can be harmed by spirits, creatures in both the astral and physical realms, and other astral travelers.

Conflicts in the astral realm look like ordinary battles, but one's fighting ability is irrelevant compared to sheer force of personality. Astral conflicts are resolved by rolling Provoke opposed by Will, and all stress suffered is mental. While you travel in the astral realm, your physical body is completely vulnerable, but you will sense any physical interference and can return to your body on your turn in the next exchange.

For details on spirits and anchors, see page 46.

Psychometry (Exclusive): All events of emotional significance leave a psychic residue on the place and objects involved. By whispering your True Name to the place or object, you create a temporary resonance between your spirit and the subject of the event. Through this connection, you experience fragmentary memories of an emotional event in the subject's history. Use this ability with caution—some events can take a toll on the mind.

An object or place can hold only one psychic impression; it takes an equally significant event to overwrite the existing one. A knife used to murder will carry that residue until it's used to kill again.

To read the subject, use Seeking opposed by the time passed since the event, starting at Fair (+2) for a month or less and increasing by one per rung on the time ladder. If the object is imprinted with a particularly intense residue—for example, feelings of terror or homicidal rage—then it has an aspect like Murder Weapon. GMs, when a player begins to use this power on such an object, tell them that they sense a strong emotion but don't reveal the aspect. This allows them to invoke the aspect for a fate point to gain an advantage on their Psychometry roll. If they wish to investigate the object in advance, they can create an advantage.

Tack the Seeker is trying to read a knife connected to a multiple murder a few years ago. That's four rungs above "a month" on the time ladder, so the opposition is Fantastic (+6), but he can invoke the Multiple Murder Weapon aspect if he knows about it.

On a success, you see a fractured vision of the event from the perspective of the object or place. If you succeed with style, you can also ask one question, which will be answered clearly. If you succeed at a cost, then you still receive the vision, but you also take a mental consequence from the psychic feedback.

Tack sees from the perspective of the knife as it's repeatedly lifted and thrust into the victim, giving him a good look. He doesn't see much of the murderer from this angle, but he can see a man's hand gripping the knife hilt and a pair of Wellington boots on his feet. If he'd succeeded with style, he could have asked "What did the murderer look like?" and received an answer.

Viewing an event with very strong emotions inflicts a Great (+4) mental attack against you, which you can defend against with your Will.

Normal Stunts

You have three points to spend on normal stunts, but you can buy additional stunts by spending points of refresh. As normal you can't go below one point of refresh.

You don't need to build stunts related to normal feline abilities, such as having claws, excellent night vision, always landing on your feet, or being able to walk along narrow rails. These are either narrative truths or invokes on your character's high concept.

Of course, you can build a stunt based on a cat trait if it is particularly important to your character or so you don't need to invoke an aspect to take advantage of it.

Some example stunts follow, but you can build your own using the rules from page 88 of Fate Core System.

General Stunts

Nine Lives: Cats have nine lives, or so the legends say. When you are taken out of a physical conflict, you can give your opponent a fate point to concede instead. You don't get any of the fate points you'd get for conceding normally.

I'm Not... Dead... Yet: If you're taken out of a continuing conflict—or have conceded—but are still physically present, you can spend a fate point to take a single action. You can use this stunt even if you died, taking a last gasp at life. You can only use this stunt once per conflict.

Athletics

Leaper: You're very good at jumping obstacles. +2 to Athletics when leaping onto or over things.

Death from Above: You can use Athletics instead of Fight when you jump to attack your foe from above.

Offensive Defense: Carefully positioning yourself, you make your opponents injure themselves as you dodge away. When you defend with Athletics and succeed with style, you can forgo your boost to deal two stress to your attacker.

Burglary

Cat Burglar: +2 to Burglary to move by rooftops, chimneys, or other high places.

Getaway Cat: You can use Burglary instead of Athletics when you're fleeing pursuit with ill-gotten gains.

Invisible Pockets: You can carry one or two small items, up to the size of a chicken egg, without holding them in your mouth. Nobody is quite sure where you hide them or how you get them back, and you can't make them reappear if you know anyone is watching.

Deceive

Ventriloquist: You're good at throwing your voice. +2 to Deceive rolls to create advantages that make others think your voice is coming from a zone adjacent to your actual location.

Method Actor: No matter how unlikable you usually are, when you adopt a guise you ooze charisma. You can use Deceive instead of Rapport when you interact with someone under a false identity in a friendly way.

Lying to Myself: Your psyche is armored in a sheath of lies. Use Deceit rather than Will to determine your extra mental stress boxes.

Empathy

Psychopomp: You know when someone is ill or dying. +2 to Empathy when detecting an illness or injury, even if it's hidden, and when determining whether a visible death, injury, or illness is feigned or real.

False Friend: You use your relationship with a target to deceive her. You can use Empathy instead of Deceive against someone when one of you has an aspect defining a positive relationship with the other.

I Feel Your Pain: Once per session, you can transfer someone's mental consequence to yourself.

Fight

Pounce: You're an expert at pouncing from concealment. +2 to your Fight roll when you make your first attack of a conflict from ambush.

Dangerous Moves: Your every movement telegraphs your martial prowess. You can use Fight instead of Provoke to intimidate.

Scrapper: You're used to punching above your weight. Once per scene, after a successful attack against something larger than you on the scale ladder (page 20), you can spend a fate point. If you do, your target must absorb your attack with a mild or moderate consequence, if it has any remaining.

Investigate

Reconstruction: Unlike most cats, you're great at working out what humans did and why. If they've left behind clues, +2 on Investigate rolls.

I've Already Won: If you've watched an opponent for a few minutes, you can plan where to strike them most effectively. You can use Investigate instead of Fight to attack that target in your next conflict with them.

We're a Lot Alike: To put your foe off balance, you point out that the two of you are very similar. Roll Investigate opposed by their Will. If you succeed, each of you gains one of the other's aspects until the end of the scene, and you get a free invoke on both. If you succeed with style, gain a second free invoke on one of those two aspects.

Lore

Literate: Unlike most cats, you can read written text. +2 to Lore when reading could help.

I've Seen Your Moves Before: You're a student of feline movement, considered a formal expert by other cats. You can use Lore instead of Athletics when defending by moving your body.

Many Lives: You've lived in the same area through successive reincarnations. Once per session, without spending a fate point you can declare a story detail related to your home area's history. For example, "Oh, sure there's a hidden shaft that leads into the old mine. It was blocked up some 85 years ago, but there's enough of a gap for bats to get through..."

Notice

Preternatural Awareness: Your sense of the other is particularly strong. +2 on rolls to notice invisible beings, astral travelers, and other subtle supernatural weirdness.

Look Before You Leap: You're an expert at judging distances, gaps, and other leaping hazards. If you have an aspect related to having appraised an area, you can use Notice instead of Athletics when jumping.

Skittish: You're so paranoid and nervous that you react very quickly to any perceived threat. Even if you're ambushed, you always act first in a conflict.

Physique

Iron Constitution: +2 on Physique rolls to resist poisons and diseases.

Not Skin and Bones: You're better padded than your average mouser. You can use Physique to defend against Fight attacks.

Size Advantage: If you're attacking something smaller than you on the scale ladder (page 20) and succeed with style, you can reduce your damage by one to create an advantage like Pinned rather than gaining a boost.

Provoke

Night Terror: You're a much scarier cat by night than by day. +2 to Provoke rolls to induce fear at night.

Bravo Cat: You have a reputation in the neighborhood for being a bully. You can use Provoke rather than Territory to obtain information or favors from other cats in the region. Any cat you bully this way gains a situation aspect to reflect resentment.

Caaaaaaaat!: You're an expert at jumping out and inspiring terror. Once per session, during a tense scene in which your victim can't see you, use Provoke as a Weapon:2 mental attack, opposed by Will.

Rapport

Top Cat: +2 to Rapport when persuading cats who see you as a leader.

Totally Lovable: You're so sweet and loveable that it's almost impossible to lie to you. You can roll Rapport instead of Empathy to detect lies, except white lies.

Snazzy Cat: When you create an aspect related to your looks, like Well Groomed, you get an extra free invoke.

Stealth

Prowl: Your ability to move silently is legendary. +2 to Stealth when hearing is the most likely sense to give you away.

Stalk: You can use Stealth instead of Fight to launch your first attack during a conflict, if you've been stalking your prey from concealment.

Surprise!: Once per session, you can reveal your hidden presence in a scene you weren't in. You immediately gain a boost called Surprise!, which only lasts for one exchange.

Territory

Mysterious: No matter when the crime took place, you weren't there! +2 on Territory rolls to convince other animals to offer false alibis for you.

It's Not What You Know: You never bothered to learn much—you've got others for that. You can use Territory instead of Lore to know stuff you heard from others.

Iron Grip: You're good at holding on to your turf. You can never have more than two negative Territory situation aspects, regardless of your Territory rating (page 12).

Will

Insatiable Curiosity: +2 on Will rolls when opposing attempts to persuade or bully you out of satisfying your curiosity.

Stubborn: Once you've set your mind on something, you won't be swayed. You can use Will to defend against Rapport.

Iron Will: You gain another mild mental consequence.

PART III: SILVER FORD

Between 1878 and 1892, Maine experienced a silver boom and became home to more than a dozen small mines. The quality of the ore was overstated, though, and the lack of local smelters drove expenses too high for mining to become profitable. Silver Ford was one of several towns that sprang up during the boom to service the mines.

Nestled on the shore of Lake Murkitt in the heart of breathtaking hill country, Silver Ford survives today as a tourist destination. Starting on Labor Day the population of the town begins to swell, until the out-of-towners outnumber the locals by almost three to one as fall begins.

Silver Ford has more than its fair share of ghost stories. A draw for tourists, they've enlivened many a campfire cookout in the hills above the town, but the residents speak of these stories with caution. Though the town enjoys very little crime, over the years a few people have gone missing in the woods and mountains, not to be found until the next spring—if at all.

As a feline living in the town, you're well aware that every ghost story contains a grain of truth. Your Parliament keeps tabs on the known spirits, but most of you agree it's wise to leave them alone unless they threaten the people of Silver Ford.

Most of the time, you work to protect your Burdens against other people or the sometimes-unnatural creatures that venture into the town from the surrounding wilderness. But every now and again, something far more sinister raises its head.

Issues in Silver Ford

Current Issue—Tourists Are a Blessing... and a Curse: While the town survives wholly on tourism, the yearly influx of out-of-towners also brings trouble of a criminal and, sometimes, supernatural nature—for example, The Red Leaf Killer. When the leaves start turning red and gold, you know to be extra vigilant around young humans. Every fall for the last five years, a nearly grown human has “run away” from Silver Ford, never to be seen again. Seekers have found the victims’ cremated remains buried in seemingly random wilderness spots, but the killer remains elusive.

Pending Issue—Ancient Evil Spirits: The town is becoming a magnet for a variety of disquieting and unquiet spirits, some seemingly waking from generations-long slumbers. Among them might be The Shriveled One, an unnatural creature who hasn’t been seen for years, but used to appear as a walking corpse with a noose around its neck. Nobody knows what causes it to appear and torment its victims—driving many of them mad—but its murderous hatred of cats is common knowledge.

Places & Faces

The places and faces for Silver Ford are detailed in Part IV—Black Silver:

The Meeting Place (The Milly Ross Play Park): Neutral ground where the cats of Silver Ford meet. Its faces are Jezzabella (page 36) and Sable (page 37).

The Burnt Place (The Old Mining Museum): A burnt-out, boarded-up shell of a building. Its faces are a very bad cat named Scarlet (page 40) and a spirit named The Burning Ghost who has a talent for local history (page 41).

Blue Moon Woods: An ancient wood of oak and pine trees. A popular haunt for young lovers by day, by night it’s an eerie borderlands between realms. Its face is Hieronymous Screech, a wise owl (page 38).

The House Across the River (Longman’s Covered Bridge): A warped and twisted bridge across the river from the old mine. Its face is Fuscus, a large brown bat who guards the bridge against evil (page 34).

The Dark Place (The Old Silver Mine): The mine has been boarded up for decades, and rumor says something evil is trapped inside. No living cat has gone in there, so nobody knows what it’s like inside or what the rumored evil might be—for now (page 43).

RANDOM TABLES FOR RANDOM CATS

Looking to create a cat quickly? Need some adventure hooks and all you've got is a few moments and a handful of Fate dice? You've come to the right place!

In this section you'll find a number of random tables. There are two styles:

Triangular tables like the first one below are used as follows: roll 4dF; then, starting from the upper left, count right for each + you roll, and down for each = you roll. So if you rolled +++= on the first table below, you'd count right twice, down once, landing on the "... Scout" result.

Rectangular tables like the second one below are used as follows: roll 2dF, then consult the Roll column for the matching result. So if you rolled a += on the second table, you'd end up with the "Excitable, Dedicated, Keen, ..." result. Pick one and match it to your first roll to get your cat's True Name! (I'd go with Hopeful Scout, myself, but maybe you're more of a Grinning Scout kind of cat.)

INSPIRATIONS & RELATED MEDIA

Our ancient forebears worshipped cats and, if the Internet is anything to go by, many of us still do. I drew from a long and storied tradition of cats as heroes when writing The Secrets of Cats, and the following is a short list of works that inspired me or which draw from the same tradition.

Cat by John Wick

“A Little Game About Little Heroes” that features housecats protecting their owners from monsters they can’t see. With a very straightforward system and a lighthearted tone suitable for younger players, Cat is well worth checking out. You can find the revised version at:

The Call of Catthulhu by Joel Sparks

This recently Kickstarted tome takes the guardian cat idea in a Lovecraftian direction, focusing primarily on animalistic eldritch horrors. For more see:

Another Fine Mess by Gray Ghost Games

A FUDGE game featuring a band of animal companions trying to rescue their masters from danger in a high fantasy setting. See:

The Price by Neil Gaiman

This short story, originally published in Smoke and Mirrors, was one of the major inspirations for The Secrets of Cats. It’s very dark, and poetic in the way Gaiman’s writing is always poetic, and focuses on the terrible price paid by one cat to protect his family from the forces of evil.

Old Possum’s Book of Practical Cats by TS Eliot

Another of my main inspirations. I’ve paid homage to Eliot’s deliciously quirky poems at various places throughout The Secrets of Cats, most obviously in The Naming of Cats, where I tell you that a cat has not one but three names.

Stephen King’s Cat’s Eye

This wonderful (and wonderfully strange) film from 1985 was the other major influence for The Secrets of Cats. If you’ve seen it, you’ll know exactly which sequence I’m talking about: the deliciously creepy scenes where the cat, General, protects a little girl from the troll that’s trying to steal her breath.

In addition to the main inspirations I’ve mentioned above, there are countless books, films, and TV series that helped form the brain-stew that led to this book, including The Rats of NIMH, the TV shows Sleepy Hollow and Supernatural, and the Night Warriors book series by Graham Masterton.
